Excerpt: .so high that Wanley suspected there was a conspiracy to run up the prices. Harley, Robert, 1st Earl of Oxford (1661-1724), was the greatest book collector of his time. His library, which included the manuscript collections of Foxe, Stow and D Ewes, was especially rich in early printed books--particularly the Greek and Latin classics and works from the presses of Caxton, Wynkyn de Worde, Pynson and other early English printers. In the library there were also a large collection of Bibles, works relating to English history, early English poetry and romances. His books were handsomely bound, mostly in red morocco, showing the pine-apple device. His son, Earl Edward (1689-1741), greatly increased the library, and at his death it numbered some 50,000 vols., exclusive of a large collection of manuscripts and pamphlets The printed books were purchased by Thomas Osborne, the bookseller, for about 13,000,...
