The men stand in a line about 6 feet apart, and throw the earth from one to the other. If Sind were entirely dependent on Sindees for carrying out heavy work, very slow progress would be made; but fortunately numbers of Afghans come down for employment each cold season--say from November to April--and are capital workers, and use a spado and barrow well. From the other side of India, Cutchees come with carts; other tribes with bullocks and donkeys, to carry the earth in bags. For ordinary canal clearance the Sindee harees, or cultivators, have to be depended upon. They are independent and deceitful where work is concerned, and cheat in earthwork excavations; it takes a good deal of experience to detect their frauds. However, with a little tact they will, in an emergency, do work which no extra wages would induce them to do. The total area of the plains of Sind is about 20,689,000 acres, of which about 11,578,000 consist of barren land: the population was, in 1869, about 1,578,000; so that there are about 577 acres of cultivated or cultivable land per head of population. Irrigation is carried on by--1. Natural flow (moke); 2. Water raised by Persian wheels (charkee); 3. Rain (baranee). The principal crops are rice, cotton, jowaree, bajaree, till, (oilseed); and these are grown in the Khureef season, from May t i October, when the Indus is in flood. Gram, wheat,...
