Not illustrated. 1879 Excerpt: .enough among my brethren of the Convention to render such criticism upon me worthless, it would be quite useless in me to say anything in reply to them. But I am here to ask gentlemen solemnly to consider this one simple fact: --There are six hundred millions of dollars that the people of this Commonwealth have invested in railroad property, and we are to be gravely told that that six hundred millions of dollars worth of property not only has no right to a voice upon this floor, not only has no right to consideration upon this floor, but that every gentleman who, from the accident of his business relations or other circumstances in life, may be supposed to have acquired peculiar knowledge on the subject, is to be regarded with distrust whenever he alludes to this subject. This large interest in this Commonwealth is to be handed over to a committee of gentlemen, for whom, personally, I entertain the profoundest possible respect, but who, I must say, with profound deference to our distinguished President, seem to have been selected not only because they were not acquainted with the particular subject committed to them, but because, by their past walk and conversation, they stood committed to a position hostile to it. And therefore it has come to pass that a crude result, not founded upon experience, nor upon knowledge of the subject, a result founded largely upon hostility to the in...
